Dear Senator,

On behalf of the United States travel industry, we are imploring Congress to make it a priority to provide the necessary funding to address the growing threat of the Zika virus.

As we stated in a letter to Congress prior to its August recess that was signed by over 100 companies, and as we are stating again, a failure by Congress to act quickly jeopardizes not only health but also the U.S. economy. The number of individuals with the Zika virus has grown and there have been multiple instances of local transmission. The impact to the travel industry will have adverse and wide spread economic ramifications. Our nation's travel industry generates $2.1 trillion in economic output, is an economic engine driving job creation across the United States, and is a top 10 employer in 49 states and the District of Columbia. That economic activity, as well as the millions of jobs supported by travel, could be put at very significant risk as a result of the virus and quick action by Congress can help prevent this.

Funding for Zika efforts will ramp up local responses to the growing threat, support an acceleration of research and development on vaccines as well as advanced approaches to mosquito control. According to the National Institutes of Health and CDC, money will run out at the end of September so it is imperative that Congress makes funding a first priority when it returns from August recess.
